Control through planning

Weeds are tough

Weeds are tough...tougher than most vegetables or flowers.

"These ever-present pests rob vegetables, flowers and landscape plants of valuable water, food, sunlight and space," said Virginia Tech Extension specialist in home horticulture, Diane Relf.

But with proper planning and persistence, weeds can be easily controlled.

If the garden is not mulched, cultivation is the easiest way to get rid of weeds. The hoe is the best equipment to keep control of the weeds.

Begin cultivation as soon as the weeds appear and cultivate whenever necessary thereafter, the specialist said.

The best time to cultivate is a day or two after a rainstorm or after irrigating-after the plants have dried off thoroughly. At this time the soil is moist and loose and easily worked.

Shallow cultivation near the surface is very important, said Ms. Relf. Do not cultivate more than one inch deep or the roots of the crops may be damaged. Use shallow, scraping motions with the hoe rather than deep, chopping cuts into the soil.

Hand pull all weeds that are close to the plants. While pulling weeds by hand, be sure to get the weed roots without disturbing roots of the crop. Remove any weeds surrounding the garden that are close to flowering our going to seed. These seeds will probably be carried into the garden area and will germinate and be difficult to eliminate.

Be sure to pull up the entire root system of weeds such as purslane, Bermuda grass, Johnsongrass and crabgrass, said Ms. Relf who is a member of the faculty of Virginia Tech's College of Agriculture and Life Sciences. If any roots of these weeds are left in the soil, they will send up new shoots and spread rapidly again through the garden.

Remember that working or cultivating soil brings weed seeds to the surface and are optimum growing conditions, so the garden will never be completely free of weeds.

But with constant checking and work, the garden can be relatively weed-free giving the vegetables and flowers the best opportunity to grow.

Animal Industry Day set

"Opportunities for the Livestock Industry through Nutrition" will be the theme of the 16th annual Animal Industry Day Friday, July 10, at Virginia Tech.

The one-day livestock program each year draws more than 2,000 livestock producers, professional workers and others involved in the animal industry to the Tech campus. Site of the affair will be the animal science livestock center, just west of the campus.

This year's program will be highlighted by an afternoon address from Roy M. Kottman, dean of the College of Agriculture and Home Economics at Ohio State University. The authority on agriculture and its inter-relationship with other industries will be making his second appearance at Animal Industry Day.

The program begins with registration at 9 a.m. At 9:30, visitors will be acquainted with on-going research at Tech, new findings and practices for livestock producers. This will be done in a four fashion continously throughout the morning.

The swine tour will take those interested to the swine unit where Eldridge R. Collins Jr., Extension agricultural engineer, will discuss "Underground Tubes for Supplemental Heating and Cooling of Swine Buildings." Charles E. Cooper, Extension swine specialist, will describe the new Virginia sow productivity program.

James W. Knight of the Tech animal science department, will discuss his research on the effects of age and nutrition on soundness of boars. Tech swine herdsman, K. L. Bryant, will address vitamin requirements for gilts and sows housed in confinement.

On the cattle, sheep and horse tour, findings from research performed at Tech in the area of forage management and utilization for beef cows and ewes, as well as for growing and finishing cattle, will be discussed by Vivien Allen, assistant professor in the department of agronomy.

Under-utilized feeds, such as crop residues, gasohol byproducts, and animal wastes, will be the topic covered by Joe Sciences.

A highlight of the morning program will be a demonstration on handling, storing and feeding large bay packages. This will include bale movers and stackers, new type pallets, stacking and covering of stacks, and feeders for cattle and sheep. The demonstration will be conducted by William H. Collins, Extension agricultural engineer; Jack Copenhaver, associate professor of animal science; and Phil Mason, professor of agricultural engineering.

In the horse area, Thomas N. Meacham of the department of animal science, will discuss the Virginia Tech horse program. David and Sally Lamb of Charlottesville, will conduct a cutting horse demonstration. Julia Snyder, a graduate student in animal science, will give a presentation on nutrition research at Tech.

Horse reproduction research will be addressed by another graduate student, Mike Fennel. Dr. Kent C. Roberts and Dr. Roger Panciera, both with the Virginia-Maryland Regional College of Veterinary Medicine, will be on the program to discuss colic and laminitis (founder).

Following a charcoaled burger, pork barbecue and watermelon lunch, L. Andy Swiger, head of the Tech department of animal science, will preside over the afternoon program, scheduled to include a short presentation by William E. Lavery, president of Virginia Tech.

Special awards will be presented by the Progressive Farmer magazine and the Virginia Farm Bureau Federation to Milton B. Wise and George A. Allen Jr., respectively. Wise is former head of the department of animal science and Allen is the recently retired Tech sheep specialist.

A portrait of former animal science head, George W. Litton, will be presented to Virginia Tech officials to hang in the new animal science building, scheduled to be ready for students by fall quarter.

Featured speaker Kottman will wrap up the day's program set to conclude about 3:30 p.m. Exhibits and publications displays will be open throughout the day.
